I am opposed to allowing the use of cellular telephones on aircraft. The space is too confined and there are no reasonable means in which to ensure such telephone conversations would not disturb other passengers. Many people are very rude and inconsiderate in the use of such phones and have no respect for the peace and solitude of others who may not be interested in hearing one-sided telephone conversations. The thought of multiple cellular conversations in progress throughout the plane at one time, and nearly everyone on the plane having such phones, young and old, is mind boggling to say the least. A compromise might be to allow the use of text messaging which is increasingly popular, as well as wireless Internet access of laptop computers and PDA's, but no verbal telephone conversations of any type. Thank you for the opportunity to voice my opinions.
